Some Methods Suggested for Secur-

unsiness so long we are positively sure to have a certain number of delinquent aucounts. They accessarily become a part, sa it were, of our stock and trade, yet how little value we usually attach when looking over the books of some concern! that has become insolvent, for, as a rule, they are sold with the other assets for little or nothing What ideal life for a business man if ful change in business would come about, what would become of us poor credit men: 1 face no other vocation left for us but to become the iceman. Wouldn't you like to be the iceman? So, for our ownselves, we had better oncourage the existence of delinquent accounts and then, with a wise look and very little action, collect some small account that no one else could possibly have collected. Then our concern sees a great necessity of advancing our salary ere some other concern discovers our wonderful value and makes it an object to change for our health, and perhaps, like the preacher, we receive "a csli" where we can do more good at a little better pay; no, having settled the fact that out of necessity we must have delinquent accounts, let us consider for a few moments how to care for the same and few moments how to care for the same and how to keep our percentige of losses under one-half of I per cent of our business sales, which, in the shoe trade is, in my judgment, a fair estimate of what the maximum losses should be.

It has been the custom of the concern I represent to make our statements daily, and the same arranged suphabetically.

On the other hand, if one-half, two-thirds or three-fourths of the members should respond, and the figures will undoubtedly fall below the one-half, is it fair to those who do remit that they should contribute to a fund which will give those not contributing a like benefit to themselves?
